better check them out in (3) the Mushroom Hunter's Field Guide. Turned out they were puffballs, alright — Lycoperdon pyriforme, or pear-shaped puffball. So I've been eating them with relish, some in my soup, but mostly chopped and cooked with cornmeal. That way they are delicious. For some reason cornmeal ~~seem~~ seems to bring out the flavor of mushrooms.

Dear Dave:

I don't know if I ever told you that this guy who has built the big house down on the flat below me is named Mason. Well, Mason is in the jerky business — he makes jerked beef that is sold in the stores around here. They call it "Hi-country beef jerky." They have a plant down on Highway 200 where they jerk the beef. I hear he's done very ~~lit~~ well in this business. ~~But~~ of course I take a dim view of all this, as you might guess. I mean, what would you think of a man who makes his living by just jerking his meat all day?

By the way, I wonder if you found that when living by yourself in the desert, you had considerably more energy than when living in the city? By "energy" I do not mean a need to be constantly busy, I mean a greater ability to undertake and complete a project that you have a sound reason for undertaking. I know this has been my response to life in the woods — I have much more energy than in the city, I'd be interested to know if you reacted the same way.

A dense patch of small puffballs has sprung up practically on my doorstep — or within 6 feet of it anyway. ~~Since~~ I figured they were puffballs, but since their appearance was a little different from the puffballs I'm used to (they are brownish on the outside, rather than white, and some of them are more dumb-bell shaped than pear-shaped — let alone ball-shaped) I thought I'd

"I'll leave him to you when I'm done with him!"

"Come on, Alfonso, you're acting like a child!"

This was the last thing that one ought to say to the little stepfather. He swore and took after me at such a speed that he was on the point of catching me. But at that instant I flew out of the open door like an arrow and took off for the farther parts of the grounds with my uncle on my heels.

In five seconds we shot like a meteor through the peach-trees, the orange-trees, and the pear-trees, and it was at that moment that the idea of the well and its stone presented itself to my mind with terrible clarity.
